And the look on

 Ometotchtli (<https://Ometotchtli.livejournal.com/>)'s face when I leaned around the bay and said "Hey Hafs, did you hear that?"

was really priceless.

The gun fired out of battery, the case failed, I had a really interesting powder mark on my hand until I scrubbed it off, and I think that's it for me and that Glock.

I never liked the damned thing anyway. Now I know it's mutual.

Think they'd let me carry a Nerf pistol from now on?

April 29 2008, 19:28:57 UTC COLLAPSE

... they'd let you carry a good, old fashioned 1911?

Not even if purchased from Springfield Armory?

(Yes, my old-fashioned is showing. *wry grin*)

Actually, you might want to consider a revolver. Much less prone to mechanical failure, easier to operate; the original Point and Click device. IF you can convince the Powers That Be to let you carry one of those, in

38/357, instead of the WunderNines, you should do just fine. (.454 Casull would have more... authority... on arrival; but those can be awful hard on the shooter, and an emphatically non-regulation round to boot.)

I love my Officers' Model 1911. But Revolvers Just Work. (As much as any firearm can be said to do so.)

*sigh* Ok. The SIG, or an HK USP, to appease Your Lords And Masters, and a "holdout" revolver that actually might get used?

From all your comments, I gather that Our Man Coyote might actually end up needing to shoot someone right back, ever' so often, and I have a strong preference for seeing him on the living side of such a day. More likely to happen if he's got a sidearm he can use well when it counts.

Thanks for the vote of confidence. :-\

But you know, I'm not a sharpshooter, but I do qual. And I can clean and maintain a pistol. It's not that hard.

April 30 2008, 00:00:59 UTC    COLLAPSE

Well, it won't be the FIRST time I owe someone an apology.

(/embarrassed)

I'm not fussing about "pilot error". I'm fussing because of my reading of your posts as wishing you didn't have to carry -- and being in a job where you apparently *must* carry, not just to calm somebody down in management, but because there's a reasonable chance you will have to return fire.

I'm trying to think of alternatives that you can *trust*, given the above.

And not doing so very good a job, I fear. *wry*

 Re: I don't suppose...
 cvillette
April 30 2008, 00:09:19 UTC    COLLAPSE

Apology accepted. And sorry in return; I misread your comment.

Field personnel. So yes, returning fire is a possibility. But I knew that when I took the job, and I worked hard to get it, and I try to maintain a professional level of competence even when I bitch about it.

I hate the damned things, honestly. They're only good for putting holes in people who didn't have holes in them before. But I also know that a good cop always tries to find another solution first.

And if you're acting in defense of an innocent, you're acting in defense of an innocent.

The good news is, most officers of the law never discharge their firearm in a combat situation.

April 29 2008, 20:23:58 UTC    COLLAPSE

[[xxxxxes out "Glock" on his "potential carry piece" list]]

Yeah. I'll stick with something a little less scary, when it comes time to buy a belt accessory...

*This happened to me not too long ago - thank goodness it was accompanied by a case blowout that threw smoke out the chamber in large quantities, and was down low enough that not only was it pretty obvious the barrel was obstructed, the rifle wouldn't chamber another round. Now the bullet is sitting on my monitor, as a reminder that Sometimes Shit Happens Even When You're Careful.
